The public transport system is generally divided into 3 categories based on the type of fare. These are: The scheme under which these fares are charged is also varied based on the category. In general, all these fares are calculated based on the distance the commuter has traveled. As per the current government proposal, these fares will be indexed to inflation rate. This, the way, the following two schedules will be modified: The first schedule entails increases in the fares, based on the distance travelled by commuters, and also to the time of travel. The bus fares, under this scheme, will also be indexed to the inflation rate. Under the second schedule, fares will be increased based on the distance travelled by commuters and to the point of their arrival. Under this, passengers need not pay for the distance travelled by public transport, nor will they be charged for the time when they alight. But, can the public accept this as an economic growth driver? Let's take a close look at the scenario.
