My issue is if i search something and see its not displayed, i need to collapse the entire main menu. how to do that? Thanks A: I assume you are using AJAX or something similar to create the slide. If so, you can actually set that up so when the slide changes it makes an AJAX request to the server to reload the main menu. This is a quick and dirty way to show you how you could do this without AJAX. Note that this will destroy any large search for you, however, you could manually search using the common, literal form of your search term (which should be good enough if it's a simple search).

$(document).ready(function() { $('#mainMenuBar').on('click', function() { var searchTerm = $("#mainMenuBar").val(); $("#searchBox").css('display', 'none'); $("#mainMenuBar").css('display', 'none'); $("#mainMenuBar").load('url for main menu'); $('#searchBox').css('display', 'inline'); $("#navBox").show(); 0cc13bf012

Saturday, April 23, 2010 Too Much Truth, Not Enough Understanding I've been a lawyer for over twenty years. It's not the law I love, though, but my profession. And as much as I love my job, the one bit I hate most of all is the mandatory dullness of other disciplines, the nuances of which are as useful as a Rorschach blot test. Writing is one of the few professions where I can spend my time thinking about what's been said, instead of merely recording what has been said. It's in my nature to question statements: That is, I believe that careful questioning can teach you more than just going through the motions. That's how I think -- and how I approach legal advice. But I don't suggest that you should attempt to teach yourself law. In my experience, the most important "truths" are not factual; they're just opinions. For instance, Congress has in recent years made law denying job-based "affirmative action" to minorities. In the past, hiring was always done by a "basket of applicants." In other words, you didn't know who you would be hiring until you actually had a job opening. Unless you wanted a specific type of person, you would be happy with that diversity of applicants. Today, some companies now deny jobs to "qualified minorities." They do that because they don't want to pay people who are "qualified" to the "preferential" applicant. The thing is, this kind of prejudice against minorities is just as wrong as a black-or-white interpretation of the law. That's why I believe it's wrong -- and why I fully support the legal concept of "affirmative action." As I recently wrote here on the "Anatomy of the Issue," it can be misleading to rely on headlines in discussing a legal issue. The Washington Post had a recent headline: "
