Despite substantial similarities in the structure and content of the General Social Surveys (GSS), the amounts of missing data (MID) on certain major variables are substantially higher in African American respondents than in Hispanic and Anglo respondents. The difference in MID, however, is different for individual variables. For example, a GSS respondent with missing values on income and occupation, race, and gender is almost always missing a value on education. Thus, the variation in MID cannot be interpreted as a result of imputation of the missing values. The variation in MID indicates that substantial work has gone into the GSS, for example, developing a Computer-Assisted Interview (CAI) that has detailed questions about life events and the usual measures. And yet, the CAI was not implemented in some states and neither in the national sample. The variation in MID also suggests that in some of the non-responding states and in some subsamples, respondents, or interviewers, are sensitive to the question about political activities
